"Nature is pleased with simplicity and effects not the pomp of superfluous causes." Sir Isaac Newton

The Dimensions of Travel

THE problems of avian migration are often approached from the standpoint of human experience; gauged thus, the enigma of orientation is insurmountable. A major barrier to objective thinking about migration seems to be the great distances that birds travel, distances that we apprehend as human travelers. We have an understanding of a bird's movements about the narrow limits of its home range, but its manner of orientation in migration is unknown. Rowan (1947) has explained that "when a flicker or a bluebird returns from the south year after year to the same nesting box, there is no essential difference between this performance and the return to the same box after a feeding foray, except in the matter of scale; in the one case the bird travels hundreds (or thousands) of miles, in the other merely yards." The depth of the mystery of migrational orientation is in direct proportion to the distance traveled.

We think of migration, and talk and write about it, in terms of miles or kilometers. Yet a bird has no conception of a mile or such, with any real-

The Dimensions of Travel

THE problems of avian migration are often approached from the standpoint of human experience; gauged thus, the enigma of orientation is insurmountable. A major barrier to objective thinking about migration seems to be the great distances that birds travel, distances that we apprehend as human travelers. We have an understanding of a bird's movements about the narrow limits of its home range, but its manner of orientation in migration is unknown. Rowan (1947) has explained that "when a flicker or a bluebird returns from the south year after year to the same nesting box, there is no essential difference between this performance and the return to the same box after a feeding foray, except in the matter of scale; in the one case the bird travels hundreds (or thousands) of miles, in the other merely yards." The depth of the mystery of migrational orientation is in direct proportion to the distance traveled.

We think of migration, and talk and write about it, in terms of miles or kilometers. Yet a bird has no awareness of a mile as such; neither can a mile be the same for two species, nor equal for man and bird. The distance of travel is relative to the traveler: "all movement is relative" (Bergson, 1911b); "distance is relative to a particular velocity of the observer" (Eddington, 1930). A journey across a field for a Meadow Mouse is far greater than for a man, although by yardsticks the trip is precisely the same for both. The mile for a walking man is longer than for a flying Canvasback; this unit is simply an arbitrary term of convenience that should be regarded as a relative rather than absolute measure of travel.
